promise doctrine principles into the law of sufficiency when it stated in AstraZeneca that the "mischievousness" of overpromising "violates the requirements of s. 27(3) of the Patent Act. Apotex had argued that Pfizer's patent "overpromises" and thus was invalid for insufficiency. Justice

Update: The Promise Doctrine and Utility Post Astrazeneca

The Promise Doctrine has been a controversial component of Canadian patent law for over a decade. 2 The Patent Act requires an invention to be "useful." The Supreme Court of Canada has interpreted this requirement to mean that the invention must have a use, and that the use must have been demonstrated or predicted by the inventors prior to the patent being filed.

Supreme Court of Canada Overturns the Promise Doctrine

The Promise Doctrine finds its roots in the "False Promise Doctrine" from the United Kingdom in the early part of the 20th Century. At that time, patents in the UK were a grant from the Crown exercising its own discretionary power. It was presumed that the Crown granted

The Promise Doctrine: Invalidated for Want of Utility

The Promise Doctrine will guide you through understanding why promises are important, offer some examples, but more importantly, help you make and keep the promises that are important in your life (in other words, all of them).

Supreme Court of Canada rules on Promise Doctrine in favor

Whereas some writers refer to the promise of the patent as the “promise doctrine,” we find no support for a court ever referring to it as a doctrine unto itself.¹⁰ We thus avoid the term. This argument put forward in this article is set out in parts two through seven. Part 2 explains the policy goals achieved by the promise of the patent.

THE PROMISE OF THE PATENT IN CANADA AND AROUND THE WORLD

Canada's promise doctrine turns patent utility into a test of an inventor's ability to predict the future, hitting innovation and health.

Promise doctrine is stifling innovation in Canada

The “Promise Doctrine” has been conclusively rejected by Canada's highest court as a basis for invalidating a Canadian patent. In a judgment that reverses years of jurisprudence in the lower courts, the Supreme Court of Canada today held that the level of utility required of a Canadian patent must not be measured by statements in the specification.

“Promise Doctrine” rejected as a - Pharma in Brief

The “promise of the patent” doctrine in Canada seeks to ensure that firms do not obtain a legal monopoly on the basis of speculative claims about increased utility—especially claims about therapeutic efficacy—that were unsubstantiated at the time of filing.
