There were Kafkaesque novels, and satirical films. Everyone seemed to feel that the foibles and absurdities of bureaucratic life and bureaucratic procedures were one of the defining features of modern existence, and as such, eminently worth discussing. But since the seventies, there has been a peculiar falling off.

A dystopia and utopia are intended to be nearly opposite ideas. It's a little strange to combine them on one list. (I understand the appeal of a "dystopian utopia"... but the two genres are still different). Especially when you have an honest-to-goodness utopia like Wells' Men Like Gods, and a dystopia like Brave New World on the same list.
